He thinks very poorly of Young Bengal and his university education, and is of opinion that Bengalis can become life such as Keshab's was. He considers Hinduism—but not in its present regraded form—to be the most universal peace and reconcilement embodied in his doctrine of the New Dispensation. The religion of India can not last; but it is destined before it disappear to do excellent work by pulling down the fabric of superstition

The writer explains the history of Hinduism, its numerous phases, the great principles on which it rests, its superiority to other religions, and the chances it has of holding its own in the future against the claims and attacks of other religions. "The main object I have in view," says he, "is to vindicate the importance of Hinduism, by showing its blind votaries and unsympathizing opponents how grossly it has been perverted, and how ill its teachings are understood and interpreted. It will be my endeavour to show my brethren of the Holy Cross how ill they profit by the teachings of their great Master, by persistently refusing to recognize merit and virtue outside the pale of the Church."	747
